Description: Software tool for data sharing, incorporating blogs and spatial registration of data. Mainly used in geological data sets. A Virtual Research Environment (VRE) aims to combine the capabilities of two existing technologies that have already seen wide adoption among scientists: - The Godiva2 data visualization system provides a means for scientists to browse interactively in a "Google Maps-like" fashion through large environmental datasets, including numerical model outputs and high-resolution satellite imagery, using only a web browser. - The LabBlog is a web-based blogging tool specifically designed for the practising scientist to record, disseminate and evaluate their research. The Blog can also be used as a collaboration tool that allows secure discussion between colleagues. Although initially designed for the use of laboratory chemists, the LabBlog is being adapted in this project to meet the needs of environmental scientists. The BlogMyData VRE will allow scientists to explore data visually using Godiva2, then make comments about features in the data on a blog. Colleagues will discover these blog entries and offer further information, providing answers to research questions through comments. Through RSS and GeoRSS feeds, colleagues, investigators and other interested parties can be notified of research activity, and scientists can discover hitherto-unknown colleagues working with similar data in similar geographic regions. Sponsors: BlogMyData is a collaboration between the Reading e-Science Centre and the University of Southampton and is one of the JISC VRERI projects.
